Equinoctial Gales Likely .- The proverbial equipoetial storm has apparently anticipated the arrival of the equinox this autumn But it cannot be safely assumed that the season will continue long to be unmarked by strong gales. These, it is likely will soon occur on the Atlantic Ocean and on our eastern seaboard, and also on the great lakes.

The paucity so far of West Indian burricance has probably created in the minds of Atlantic seamen a false sense of security, or at least a half-formed hope that the period for these fearful tropical cyclones will pass without any great tempest. It will be very unsafe, for mariners especially, to as ume that they will escape during the rest of this month with no worse cyclone than they have recently had. One of the most destructive and widespread West Indian hurricanes on record emerged from the tropics on October 6 1866, and it will not be wise to count the hurricane season passed until the end of

Meantime all commanders of vessels entering tropical or sut-tropical seas should have their ships in the finest trim for fighting the fiery cyclones which the next fortnight can scarcely fail to bring with it. Moreover, along our entire Gulf and Atlantic coast line owners of property liable to be undermined or injured by ravages of the incoming Atlantic storm waves should take proper precautions to protect it as far as possible While boping for the hest all concerned should be prepared for the worst that "the gigantic whiriwing of the quinox" can do .-N. PARTRIDGES WILL BE PLENTIFUL. - From all parts of Maryland and Virginia where partridges are usually found come accounts that will gladden the sportsman's heart. Last winter was not severe enough to kill any of the birds, and the batchings of this season have been free from barm. birds paired early, and this, it is claimed, means a second hatching for most pairs. Good dogs will be at a premium if the predictions of the observing sportsman prove correct, and many country friends will be surprised to have a long-neglected correspondence respended by city boys who are looking forward to an invitation to shoot on the aforsaid country friend's farm,

There are only two genuine calves for sorrow-prayer and work. Trust in God and keep doing, are the best recipes for every human care.
